The GREEN DESERT

THE FILM

The Green Desert is a public television documentary about the collapse of the Colorado River system and the American food supply that depends on it — available as a turnkey screening event for conferences, customer gatherings, and internal programs.

Ninety percent of the winter vegetables consumed in the United States are grown in three desert valleys on water delivered from the Colorado River. The film tells that story from the growers who farm it to the officials who allocate it. Directed by Leo Zahn. Broadcast nationally on public television via NETA. Video Librarian called it "informative and thought-provoking."

On camera: Pat Mulroy (Southern Nevada Water Authority) · Terry Fulp (Bureau of Reclamation) JB Hamby (Colorado River Commissioner for California) plus Imperial and Coachella Valley growers.

WHY THIS ROOM, WHY THIS YEAR

Lake Mead is 27% full. Lake Powell has fallen to 22% — both at record lows.

- Federal rules issued this month cut Colorado River use by 12% in California, 31% in Arizona, and 28% in Nevada through 2028.
- If reservoirs keep falling, the ten-year plan allows mandatory cuts of up to 40% of the three states' combined allotments.
- Roughly three-quarters of the water drawn from the river goes to agriculture.

Every customer you have in the Basin is making capital decisions against these numbers now. Most of them have read the headlines. Very few have seen what it looks like on the ground.

The GREEN DESERT

WHAT YOUR AUDIENCE LEAVES WITH

How Colorado River water is physically delivered and legally allocated — the 1922 Compact, priority rights, the All-American Canal, Hoover and Glen Canyon

- What the shortage means for the American food supply, told through the growers living it rather than through statistics
- Context for the federal operating framework now being implemented across the Basin
- A shared reference point that makes the rest of your program land
